A Whale Hunt.

When within two hundred yards of the whale we saw that the little black thing by the monster's side was her calf. Captain Mariano, seeing a fair mark, quickly fired the swivel gun. A sharp report followed and the boat quivered under the shock for a full half minute. Following the sound the harpoon could be seen cleaving the twenty fathoms of space between the boat and the whale, in which it was buried out of sight just below the right forefin. Following and attached to the steel missile was some two hundred feet of the stout line coiled in the bow, which bore the appearance of a flash of dark brown lightning as it zigzagged through the air after its powerful motor. The wounded leviathan lay almost motion-less for a period of twenty seconds, as if unable to comprehend the nature of the attack, and then with a snort, like the pull of a locomotive, she descended beneath the sursface at a rate that made the manilla line moke and emit sparks of fire as it ran out over the bow.
Suddenly the movement stopped; the men bent to their oars, ready to pull in either direction at the first sight of the invisible monster. Capt. Mariano peered uneasily into the blue depths forward, the boat steerer performing a similar office astern. "Pacha pratis!" (back all) sud-denly shouted the Captain and the five oarsmen sent the boat astern just in time to clear by a couple of fathoms the black, ugly hulk of the infuriated whale, as it rose to the surface and spouted twin coulmns of water forty feet in the air, a bucket or two of the briny fluid seeking out the back of the reporter's neck for a resting place as it descended. Before the animated water-spout could repeat the dose the boat was out of range—both of his fire-extinguishing apparatus and his terrible flukes which were now beginning to thrash the water with a violence that created a cloud of

The performance lasted for two or three minutes, during which the Captain was unable to obtain a safe shot at the whale with the bomb-gun, which he raised to his shoulder more than once only to lower it again in despair. Suddenly the tail ceased its exercises, and the next instant a jerk was felt that buried the bow of the boat in a white cap caused by the lightning-like descent of the whale. Barely had the staunch craft righted itself after the shock than a second tug was felt, and before the despairing reporter could offer up a fear-in-spired prayer the boat was dashing through the water at a terrible rate. The speed was frightful, and for ten minutes the water stood a wall fully eighteen inches above the forward gunwale on each side of the boat, the velocity preventing even a single drop from entering the interior.

At the end of the time mentioned fully four miles of the distance between where the animal was struck and the head of the bay had been covered, and the speed of the living tug began to slacken through exhaustion. Finally it ceased altogether, and after spouting a strong jet of blood-red tinge the stricken mother once more sounded. Her stay underneath the waves was of short duration, and on reappearing on the surface her movements were only sufficient to keep the gigantic carcass afloat. Pulling up to within five fathons of the whale the men rested on their oars. Ten seconds later Cap-tain Mariano had his chance; a second explosion was heard, and the rubber-winged bomb buried itself in the mass of blubber. Scarcely had the smoke cleared away from the bow, when the mnffled boom of the bomb, exploding in the historical residence of Jonah, sounded the death-knell of the old humpback. The victim's huge bulk once more became animated, and the deadly flukes lashed the water as the whale struggled in the throes of death. The water-spouts changed into blood-spouts, and grew smaller and smaller as the struggles became more contracted, until finally, with one last effort, the leviathan rolled on its back and expired. The reporter heaved a sigh of relief and heartily joined in the crew's shout of victory, which was answered from the other boats, by this time only a few fathoms
